You might be surprised to find that despite growing up with smartphones and social media, Gen Z values authenticity—especially in how they engage digitally. They prefer to put their trust in real people over polished paid content. While digital marketing is essential to any well-designed recruitment-marketing strategy, costly missteps occur when a college's messages are perceived as inauthentic or they get lost in a maze of digital communication channels.

Perhaps the biggest challenge to educators is to find time to teach students to think while covering course content. Often, this leads to content coverage at the expense of intellectual activities that enhance critical thinking. Moreover, some instructors assume that by covering content and asking challenging questions, students will attain critical thinking skills. The webinar will address these problems by providing a proven method to cover course content and enhance critical thinking skills simultaneously.
